Although, it is very hard to pin point what is causing the blockage, it can be an advantage if you can identify the early signs of having a clogged drain.

How Do I Know I Have A Blocked Drain?

One of the obvious signs that you are having blocked drains is when more than one plumbing fixture is having trouble draining water.

First affected are the toilets since they have the direct access to the main sewage system. If toilets are clogged, then most likely the problem is with the main line sewer drainage.

Bath tubs and showers also share the same sentiments. When you notice that water slowly drains or does not drain at all, then you have a blocked drain.

Sinks joins the team when everything else above is clogged. But you can determine if the issue lies with the toilet alone. Running the water in the sink should not allow the water in the toilet rise. If this is so, then the problem is already on the main line sewage system.
